Criminology Among Rural Stimulant Users in the United States

Affiliation: University of Kentucky, Lexington

Source: Crime & Delinquency, vol. 37, no. 4, pp. 500-521, Jul 2011

Abstract: Despite the increase in media attention on "meth cooking" in rural areas of the United States, little is known about rural stimulant use—particularly, the criminal activity associated with stimulant use. Data were collected from community stimulant users in rural Otoe, Arkansas, and Kentucky (N = 769). Findings from three logistic regression models indicate that younger stimulant users (M = 32.55, SD = 10.35), those with more convictions, and those who used crack frequently were significantly more likely to have been arrested for committing a substance-related crime, a property crime, or another crime in the 6 months before entering the study. Implications include the need for longitudinal studies to further understand rural stimulant use, as well as increased community and corrections-based drug abuse prevention and treatment interventions for stimulant users who live in rural areas. The objective of this paper is to examine the impact of crime on FDI inflows in 103 Italian provinces. The incidence of criminality is measured through the number of complaints for different kinds of crime. The analysis has been conducted using different estimation methods for panel data. The results show how the correlation between organized crime is both negative and significant. This relationship appears strong even when, in specifications, it is considered as an indicator of financial incentives for investment. Furthermore, such a correlation between crime and FDI seems to be valid only for certain crimes, traditionally related to the presence of organized crime of the mafia type. Even if these results suggest that crime, in itself, a deterrent for foreign investors, this does not exclude the possibility that a high incidence of (certain) crimes may be perceived as a signal of a socio-institutional environment unfavourable for FDI.
